Key Points of the Decision

- The Court held that the government's actions were unconstitutional because they violated the First Amendment's guarantee of free speech.
- The Court also held that the government's actions were unconstitutional because they violated the Fifth Amendment's guarantee of due process.
- The Court's decision is a landmark one, and it is a testament to the power of the law to bring about change in the world.

Justice Brandeis, in his dissenting opinion, argued that the government's actions were constitutional because they were necessary to protect the public interest.

Justice Brandeis also argued that the government's actions were constitutional because they were necessary to protect the public interest.
